c. 1888-1998 (bulk of collection from 1940s to 1980s)
339 textual records, 137 photos and 2 maps | .5 linear feet | One box

Mining has been a part of Corona’s history since 1859 when Daniel Sexton and W.W. Jenkins discovered the Temescal Tin Mines sometimes referred to Cajalco Tin Mines. Litigation over the title of the Tin Mine occurred between 1860 and 1868 which had an impact on investment in the mine. The mine went through several owners between 1860 and 1894. In 1894, the Temescal Tin Mines ceased operations. Instead, the company who owned the Tin Mines, San Jacinto Land Company turned their focus from mining to agriculture. In 1888, the Temescal Rock Quarry was opened to furnish rock for macadamizing streets in Los Angeles and nearby towns (California Division of Mines, Bulletin 178, p.93). By 1914 the quarry was owned by Temescal Rock Company which produced ballast rock for building railroads. (California Division of Mines, Bulletin 178, p.93). By 1920, Blue Diamond Materials Company from Los Angeles had purchased the mine and used the “porphyry” for building aggregate and road metal. At the time, mining was done by tunnel or coyote method. Blue Diamond Materials Co. kept the plant active until it was destroyed by fire in 1927. It remained idle until 3M Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company purchased the plant in 1941. In 1948, 3M manufacturing of roofing granules for the asphalt shingle industry started and continues to the present day.

The majority of the collection contains photos of Blue Diamond Mining activities. The February 18, 1958 coyote blast plans are included in the collection. Newspaper, magazine and journal articles concerning mining in the area are part of the collection. This includes information on the Temescal Tin Mining operations-reports written on in 1888 on the viability of tin being found in the mines and articles written in The California Mining Journal questioning the reasoning behind not actively mining the tin found in the Temescal Valley. The information included in the collection describes the controversy surrounding mines and mining in the Temescal Valley area. Publications from the California Division of Mines and Geology related to mining and mining regulations are included in this collection. The majority of the collection covers the 1940s to 1980s.
